

ABSTRACT

In accordance with one aspect of the invention, a constraints-based method of analysis of gene expression data has been shown to provide a useful method for target identification in gene expression profiles. Such constraints-based methods of analysis provide useful analytical methods that focus on genes and related pathways that are likely to be important in disease progression, that is, to provide likely candidates that will serve as targets for various therapeutics.